Tips for Travellers

Planning Your Journey

Trains are fairly infrequent (especially on a Sunday), so be sure to check the timetable before you set off. You can check for any temporary changes to train times by visiting www.nationalrail.co.uk

The full Cambrian Line timetable is available from most staffed stations served by Transport for Wales, or as a PDF from www.tfwrail.wales or www.networkrail.co.uk

Using a ‘Request Stop’

Most of the smaller stations are request stops. To board at such a station, give the driver an appropriate signal in plenty of time, just like with a bus. To leave the train, speak to the conductor well before reaching your stop.

Changing Trains at Dovey Junction

Be aware that Dovey Junction is just a pair of platforms in the middle of a field! Occasionally timings mean you have to change trains there, but if there’s a long gap between trains you’ll be more comfortable changing at Machynlleth.

Tickets and Fares

An Explore Cambrian ticket offers unlimited travel along the line after 09.00 on a weekday, or all day on a Saturday, Sunday or bank holiday.

- Adult .............................................................. £13.00
- Child (age 5 to 15 inclusive, accompanied by adult) ………£6.50
- Family (up to 2 adults and 2 children) …………………… £22.00

Prices correct at 11th April 2019.

You can also buy North Wales Rover tickets valid on buses as well as trains, priced from £13.80 to £37.10 depending on how far you want to explore.

Tickets can be bought from staffed stations, or on board the train if you board at a station without a ticket office.

Good value Anytime Day Return tickets are also available for simple return journeys. Groups of three to nine adults travelling together should ask about the Small Group Day Ticket which gives a 25% discount on off-peak fares.

If you wish to visit Portmeirion, or to travel of any of the many steam railways along the route, do show the ticket office your mainline railway ticket, as they may give you a discount.

For the latest prices, and fares from further afield, consult www.nationalrail.co.uk

Useful bus routes include:

T2 Aberystwyth-Machynlleth-Dolgellau-Porthmadog-Bangor and T3 Barmouth-Dolgellau-Wrexham
Aberystwyth

‘Aber’ is Mid Wales’ main seaside resort, a long-established university town and an important administrative centre at the heart of Cardigan Bay.

The town features a mix of unusual attractions such as an electric cliff railway, a Victorian camera obscura, Wales’s National Library and a sweeping promenade and beach.

This characterful town also enjoys a great variety of pubs, cafés, restaurants and intriguing specialist shops.

For the fullest information about this excellent town, visit www.aberystwyth.org.uk

Borth

A village resort that comes to life in the summertime when its sprawling caravan parks fill with holidaymakers.

The sand and shingle beaches are popular with families and just five minutes from the station. At low tide you may also see the remains of an ancient submerged forest, which some like to say are all that’s left of Cantre’r Gwaelod, a legendary Welsh land lost to the sea through the carelessness of its night watchman.

The railway station itself features its own free museum full of items related to local railway history. It also featured in the S4C / BBC drama series ‘Hinterland’ or ‘Y Gwyll’.

Within Borth you’ll also find the Animalarium, a zoo in miniature with a mixture of exotic and domestic species.

Dovey Junction

Once equipped with a signal box and a station buffet, this windswept station is now little more than a platform in the middle of a field.

Should you fancy hopping off the train here for novelty value, comparative civilisation can be reached using the path from the end of the platform, though you will get odd looks from fellow passengers.

A twenty minute walk from the station (turn right upon reaching the main road) takes you to the village of Eglwysfach for the Ynyshir Nature Reserve or, a little further on, the picturesque Dyfi Furnace.
Machynlleth

A typical Mid Wales market town that has managed to hold on to its own individual character.

The town centre bristles with small-town shops, pubs and cafés, with barely a chain store in sight. Traditional butchers and household stores stand side-by-side with more unusual shops selling crafts, souvenirs and antiques.

Places to explore include the MOMA art gallery, housed in a former chapel, and the home of Owain Glyndwr’s 15th-century parliament.

A short bus ride north can take you to the Centre for Alternative Technology, a pioneering project that’s been promoting more environmentally-sensitive living since the 1970s. Now a leading tourist attraction, with its own water-powered cliff railway.

Penhelig and Aberdovey

Two stations located at either end of Aberdovey (Aberdyfi).

Aberdovey is a small resort popular for sailing, with a couple of interesting little shops and has a handful of places to eat and drink, too.

The large sandy beach and dunes near Aberdovey station enjoy superb views across the Dovey Estuary to Ynyslas. Also worth an explore is the estuary path which clammers along the rocky banks of the Dovey (or Dyfi) River from the gardens by Penhelig station.

Tywyn

One of the larger settlements along the coast, Tywyn is another resort town with a busy high street.

The seafront, with its beach, crazy golf and amusement arcades is a few hundred metres from the station, past the two huge radio masts which relay BBC Radio Wales and BBC Radio Five Live to listeners along Cardigan Bay.

Tywyn’s also the starting point for the Talyllyn Railway, a preserved narrow-gauge steam railway that chuffs off into the hillside towards Abergynolwyn, seven miles away. The railway’s calling points include the popular Dolgoch Falls.

Tonfanau

One of a handful of stations that came close to being shut down in the 1990s, Tonfanau is still fairly quiet. However, it offers peace, a pleasant view and a good starting point for an easy walk south to Tywyn over the River Dysynni.

Dotted around you’ll also see the crumbling remains of a long-gone army base. Built in 1938 and demolished in the mid 1980s, a couple of walls and some foundations remain.

Llwyngwril

Another of Gwynedd’s small coastal villages - some houses, a school and a couple of shops.

A climb up onto the hill behind the village offers a wonderful view out to sea, with the mountains of North Wales stretching into the distance. What’s more, the view isn’t spoiled by ugly buildings on the valley floor like at Harlech!

If you want to get off the train here and go for a wander, you’ll find that Fairbourne’s just under three miles’ walk away. Tonfanau is around five miles away - the walk is sometimes pretty and sometimes dull, but it’s always interesting to be the only person boarding there.

Fairbourne

The quieter neighbour to Barmouth, with a two mile stretch of sandy beach. To the south of the village, the beach is still edged with concrete wartime fortifications.

Rising sea levels have made it increasingly difficult to defend this area from the waves. In 2014, the local authority’s plans for coastal management suggested that maintenance of sea defences may cease in 2025, with a gradual abandonment of the village over the following decades.

Fairbourne is also the terminus of the miniature Fairbourne & Barmouth Steam Railway, which runs form the mainline station, along the seafront and then along a pier out into the Mawddach Estuary. From the pier, there’s a summertime ferry you can catch across the water to Barmouth.

Morfa Mawddach

Once a railway junction with a route inland to Wrexham, there’s little to see here nowadays. Now, the old railway has been converted into a cycle path and it’s possible to follow the Mawddach Trail along the estuary to Dolgellau.
You can also walk across the toll bridge shared with the railway as an alternative way to arrive in Barmouth. The views inland along the estuary are excellent on a clear day and walking gives you a bit more time to take everything in than on the train.

Barmouth

Barmouth is one of the most popular destinations on the Cambrian Coast and during the holiday season it is very busy with tourists, primarily from the West Midlands.

It’s not a huge resort, but it boasts all the usual attractions such as a big sandy beach, lots of fast food and ice cream places and amusement arcades. There are also a couple of interesting shops to browse.

With several cafes, restaurants and pubs, Barmouth is a good place to stop off for a meal or a drink during your day.

Away from the bustling seafront, the town seems to be built almost vertically up the rocky hillside and there are lots of paths that lead to viewpoints high up above the town.

The open hillside of Dinas Olau was the first piece of land to be owned by the National Trust.

Llanaber

Llanaber is just past the northern end of Barmouth. This is further than most of the tourists get, but is within walking distance along the sea wall and beach.

It’s not a great beach for exploring as it’s all huge rocks - no good for stretching out on, but perhaps a nice quiet alternative to Barmouth for enjoying the sea and sun.

A cemetery just above the station has memorials to many of Barmouth’s former residents.

Talybont

This small station serves the village of Tal-γ-Bont, with its various caravan parks.

Dyffryn Ardudwy

Inland lies the village of the same name, which is home to some well-preserved burial chambers dating from around 3500BC.

A mile to the west lies Morfa Dyffryn, a sandy, dune-backed beach that stretches several miles along the cost. The beach is well known for its long-established and now officially-recognised kilometre-long naturist area.

Llanbedr

Places of note near to this tiny station include Shell Island, about two miles away. This little peninsula is noted for its variety of shells and wildlife, as well as its campsite.

Also nearby is the site of RAF Llanbedr, an airfield constructed during World War II and used in more recent times for testing of unmanned aircraft. Closed since 2004, the Welsh Assembly Government is seeking a commercial use for the site.

Pensarn

This small halt lies alongside the estuary. Being only about a mile from the adjacent stations at Llandanwg, it is a good end-point for a short walk along the Wales Coastal Path.

Llandanwg

The station here provides easy access to a village with a popular little beach, as well as a small 13th century church.

Harlech

The well-known castle at Harlech is a magnificent landmark, perched high up on the hillside looking out to sea. If you wish, you can pay to go inside and explore the remains, as well as admiring the exterior from outside.

If you’ve made the steep climb up to the castle, you can also explore the village - there are a couple of small shops that could be worth a browse, and there’s also a viewpoint looking out over the Irish Sea that is mentioned in the Welsh ‘Mabinogion’ legends.

Tygwyn

A particularly quiet station at a rural level crossing. Within walking distance of Talsarnau station, either along the main road or footpaths through nearby fields.
Talsarnau
Serves the little village of the same name. Various footpaths cross the hillside behind the village.

Take the path in the opposite direction to the village to the estuary for a view of Portmeirion village, clinging to the hillside across the water. It’s also possible to walk across to Ynys Gifftan, an uninhabited island in the estuary—although be aware that the tides can make this dangerous and even impossible at times.

Llandecwyn
Small station overlooking a sandy estuary, just across the road bridge from Penrhynedduraeth.
Also within walking distance of Talsarnau station.

Penrhynedduraeth
The station serves a large, though not especially touristy, village uphill from the station with a few local shops. The sandy estuary here is rather spectacularly punctuated by the huge electricity pylons which march off in the direction of Trawsfynydd.
The former explosives works which closed in 1997 has now become a nature reserve noted for nightjars.
Also within easy walking distance of Minffordd station.

Minffordd
Minffordd station has an interchange with the Ffestiniog Railway from Porthmadog to Blaenau Ffestiniog—although most visitors would board at Porthmadog instead of here.
Close to the station is the Garth Quarry, which has existed since 1870 and still supplies stone for roads and railways.
This is also the closest station to the colourful, dream-like village of Portmeirion, which is just a mile away. Built by Sir Clough Williams-Ellis between 1925 and 1975, this truly delightful Italianate village is a glorious jumble of attractive colourful buildings arranged around a central piazza.
Portmeirion is well worth the admission charge for a day visit, with buildings and gardens to explore, as well as shops and places to eat. It’s also possible to stay in the hotel or one of the village houses here.

Porthmadog
A small but busy little town with a marina and harbour and a thriving Welsh community.
The town was founded following William Madocks’s building of the Cob, a sea wall used to reclaim land from the sea.
Two town is also a hub for some well-known narrow gauge railways: the Ffestiniog Railway and the Welsh Highland Railway travel through the mountains to Blaenau Ffestiniog and in the other direction through to Caernarfon.

Criccieth
A pleasant, large village neighbouring Porthmadog.
Visit to walk along the seafront and beach, remembering to pick up an ice cream from locally-famous Cadwalader’s (also found in Porthmadog).
Criccieth Castle is perched on a hill above the beach and although somewhat smaller than Harlech’s it’s still quite a nice, picturesque little place.

Penychain
This station once served a large Butlins holiday camp. Now, it serves a caravan park and the smaller Haven park.

Abererch
Small station situated close to the village’s beach.

Pwllheli
Pwllheli is a busy and strongly Welsh-speaking market town on the Llyn Peninsula.
The town has the usual collection of shops and a market, along with two beaches and a marina.
